excerpt from science for beginners an introduction to the method and matter of science only a generation ago it was the prevailing idea that all instruction in schools and all learning by pupils should be confined to the schoolroom and to books nature study was unknown except that once in a while curious relics from foreign countries were brought in to emphasize some phase of the pupil's study a little later more material was taken into the classes and used to verify to some extent the statements of the books but these were only fragments of the part of nature which they represented and for that reason aroused very little interest in either teacher or pupil out of this somewhat fragmentary study has grown the laboratory method which is used in the better schools at the present time but even yet there is not enough use of the real thing and the whole thing the material for study is gathered by the teacher or is furnished by the school authorities and the pupils are required to handle only those portions which will illustrate the point under discussion gradually however teachers are coming to see that to get the best results the pupil must whenever possible gather his own material when this point is conceded it is readily agreed that the pupil may oftentimes study his materials to greater advantage in their natural environment the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from all such reasoning is that in many cases the study of nature requires that the pupil should go out of doors and under proper guidance observe examine describe reason upon and finally draw his own conclusions concerning the matter in hand about the publisher forgotten books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books find more at forgottenbooks.com this book is a reproduction of an important historical work forgotten books uses state of the art technology to digitally reconstruct the work preserving the original format whilst repairing imperfections present in the aged copy in rare cases an imperfection in the original such as a blemish or missing page may be replicated in our edition we do however repair the vast majority of imperfections successfully any imperfections that remain are intentionally left to preserve the state of such historical works
